After having a crash on my C++ application on my Samsung Galaxy phone, I learned a few things. First, that when C++ crashes with no error, it seems to just shut down. The way I figure this is by checking my hudl.txt file. I have it set to write every 5 minutes. That file looks something like this: 12-02-2012 07:42:09, 1623.1 12-02-2012 07:52:09, 2763.1 12-02-2012 07:57:09, 1298.1 12-02-2012 08:07:09, 526.1 12-02-2012 08:16:09, 560.1 Here, 1623.1 is my time when the crash happened, and 2763.1 is the crash time of my last time writing to this file. I have been using a similar method for detecting if a crash is happening to this day, and it works. However, I have an older phone from 2009, and this method isn't working any longer. So, I was wondering if there was another way to detect a crash and to record its time. I tried to use stack traces in order to detect a crash, but couldn't find the right file I could open to see this. If you have any other ideas or comments, please share. Thanks in advance. A: You could use the "Crashes" section of the "All Settings" option on your phone's Application Settings. This will give you a list of your active applications and their status, including crashes. Summary: For years, Frank has been happily married to Estelle, a wealthy, elderly woman in her late 80s who enjoys her very much. Frank thinks he deserves the best because of the sacrifices he has made for his family and now Estelle is ready to spoil him in the most unconventional way: her purse. He will receive a bonus and she will give him a blowjob in the bathroom of a New York restaurant. She is a regular in the restaurant and nobody would suspect anything. A widow at the age of 73, it's time for her to enjoy the pleasures of a younger man. Frank is already super-excited. It's a one night stand for 82157476af
